A PISTOL AT A PRIZE-FIGHT.

BRUTAL SCENE THIS MORNING AT A MILL ON LONG ISLAND.

The referee's life threatened by a rough-sailor Brown and one of the contestants knocked down by the crowd and kicked and beaten—The referee calls it a draw at the end of three rounds.

The party of sporting men that ventured out on Long Island at an early hour this morning to witness a finish fight between Sailor Brown, of Boston, and Dick Moorehouse, of Salem, Mass., were treated to quite a sensational scene at the close of the three rounds which the men fought.

The referee, Jerry O'Brien, a good-natured, whole-hearted, old sport was somewhat startled. An unknown ruffian touched his chest with the barrel of a .38-calibre revolver, and exclaimed at the same time that if Moorehouse did not get the decision on account of his being felled by the sailor that Jerry would receive the contents of the little gun.

While this little drama was being enacted between Jerry and the ruffian, Brown was being unmercifully kicked and punched by a lot of toughs. A well-known pugilist stepped to the centre of the all-round fight and pushed the men away, one after the other, until quiet prevailed.

The ruffian with the pistol shot off behind a tall cedar tree, and was not heard from until on the way home.

Moorehouse is twenty-two years of age, stands 5 feet 8 inches tall and weighs 137 pounds. Jack Kenny, a well-known pugilist, pushed to the centre of the all-round fight and pushed the men away, one after the other, until quiet prevailed.

The third round had hardly opened when the sailor struck his man and threw him heavily. Then came the disgraceful scene, and such of its kind has seldom been witnessed in this vicinity.

The referee declared the battle a draw. Then Brown was again punched and kicked. His head and body was cut and bruised from top to bottom.

The ruffian that brought Brown to the city was stopped on the road, and if the same pugilist who had stopped the other fight had not arrived on the scene Brown would have fared much worse than he did.

On reaching the city he was conveyed at once to an up-town doctor, who attended to his wounds.

MOOREHOUSE GONE ASTRAY.
A Friend of A. Blackburn Lost It, but A. Blackburn Won't Tell How.

AN EVENING WORLD reporter called on A. Blackburn at 29 Murray street this morning. He found him, with the assistance of a pretty telegrapher, after searching every other corner of the four-story building on the upper floor at the cashier's window.

The window was closed, and the reporter pounded upon it gently with his finger nails. An answer came at the bottom by opening a six-inch square porthole, and in this the reporter saw six square inches of face.

It was a blond face, with a small yellow mustache. "I wish to see A. Blackburn," said the reporter to the six square inches.

The porthole was closed, the big window thrown open and a little man said, "I am he."

"How did you come to lose your dress shirt?" asked the reporter.

"The window was closed again, and the reporter could hear whispering behind it. Then it opened again and A. Blackburn said:

"I didn't. It was a friend. He says he will pay me $25 reward offered in the advertisement."

REWARD will be paid for the return of pocket watch, containing chain, diamond studs and collar buttons and gold cuff links, left in this advertisement, at 29 Murray street, about 3 P. M., July 28. A. Blackburn, 29 Murray street.

Thus read the reporter.

"How much was it worth?"

"Oh, hundred and twenty-five or thirty, I guess."

"Chased a pretty girl out of the car, eh?"

"A male which might mean yes or no—as you like."

"You were absorbed in a World editorial that he forgot his shirt?"

"Another smile."

"Just got it out of hoc for that party at Dr. H's?"

"Oh, come! You can't get anything out of me. I don't know whether it was boxed, pulled or ruffled. His temper was ruffled. He's ruffling his temper now, and safety for yours would be to get out of there."

The reporter left.
